Accumulation of intra-abdominal fat is associated with increased risk for cardiovascular disease. Small changes in thickness of the abdominal subcutaneous fat layers could represent an effective target for lifestyle modification. We describe a new imaging method for quantifying the subcutaneous fat layers in pigs using infrared light. Six pigs were scanned three times with infrared light while lying and after standing on their hind legs. Different layers of fat could be distinguished in vivo: the superficial layer (SL), the deep layer (DL), and the visceral adipose tissue. The probe was successfully calibrated in vitro and, in two pigs, the quantities of fat in different regions of the abdomen could be measured in vivo, and a total of 101 measurements were obtained. After a fasting period of 2 h, postprandial fat and energy deposits were measured for 45 min. Throughout the investigation, the variation coefficients were
